As outlined in the author’s article of the same title in the current fall issue of the ARSC JOURNAL, what until recently could be known of Yma Sumac’s artistry was based on her handful of commercial record albums: A beautiful but very unusual voice spanning more than four octaves, heard primarily in quaint sounding 1950’s exotica pop music. Listeners often doubted the reality of what they were hearing, and much misinformation grew up around a voice that was beyond category. Now, at last we have the opportunity to assess Sumac’s unique talents based upon live performances, in which both her superb quality as a vocalist and her genuine artistry as a performer can be more accurately understood and appreciated.

Heard live, Sumac was a far more versatile performer than her commercial recordings reveal. An unexpected vivaciousness and depth of feeling disclose a musical artist of much greater range and substance, possessing a contralto voice that was fully developed in the classical sense. Even that was greater than suspected. Heard live, her seemingly limitless upper range extends above Double High C for almost a half octave higher than can be heard on her commercial recordings. Her live recordings mandate a reassessment of her musical stature. Haley asserts that Sumac’s voice can be compared to Colbran, Malibran and Viardot-Garcia, three great wide-ranging contraltos of the bel canto era, an operatic voice type completely unknown to us today.
John H. Haley is the newly appointed Editor of the Sound Recording Reviews section of the ARSC Journal. He is an ARSC member of many years who does audio restoration work and is a practicing attorney with a lifelong interest in both classical and popular music. He has a Bachelors of Music degree from University of North Texas with concentration in voice and piano, and while in college he served as a professional chorister for the Dallas Civic Opera. Since 1987 he has served as a Board Member of the Bel Canto Institute (www.belcantoinst.org), an organization that teaches bel canto opera style to young opera singers every July in Florence, Italy, serving as President of the Board since 2005.
